Ketchum to Spot-Spray Noxious Weeds Applications of Low-Toxicity Herbicide to Begin Early Spring

KETCHUM, IDAHO – The city of Ketchum will begin spot-spraying noxious weeds in city rights-of-way with low-toxicity herbicide as warmer days begin.

The city will spray only specific weeds identified by the state of Idaho as “noxious.” No entire rights-of-way will be sprayed and notices will be placed in affected areas 72 hours in advance, Juerg Stauffacher, parks and natural resources superintendent said.

It is safe for humans and animals to come in contact with the spray as soon as it is dry, he added. However, the city is taking extra precautions. Signs will be posted suggesting that people avoid the weeds for 72 hours after spraying. A special dye will allow people to see sprayed weeds easily, he added.

Residents who prefer to pull noxious weeds adjacent to their properties by hand may do so by notifying the city parks superintendent at 726-7820. The Parks Division may lend tools and provide garbage bags on request. It also is available to assist in identifying noxious weeds on public and private property and to answer questions about city policy.

Noxious weeds are species that grow rapidly and crowd out native plants. They can increase water and wind erosion, alter nutrient cycling, destroy wildlife habitat, reduce the usefulness of recreation areas, and decrease agricultural productivity, according to the Idaho Department of Agriculture. Spot-spraying will continue throughout the summer as required, Stauffacher said.
